Bed sores, also known as pressure ulcers, are a common problem among patients in long-term care facilities, especially in hospital settings. A lot of these sorts of conditions have cost billions to treat. Unfortunately, bedsore prevention is still based on some old beliefs, and the causes of bedsores continue to be unverified. It's been known for some time that elderly patients are at risk for bedsores, but we still don't have the full picture on exactly why they develop, nor what conditions need to be addressed to prevent bedsores. As with most things, a deeper look into the cause of bedsores has revealed some puzzling facts. Firstly, what we believed to be the absolute cause of bed sores seems to have changed over time as bed sores, especially bedsores in the neck and spinal area, have increased. We've known that older people are at risk for bedsores because of weak blood circulation. Additionally, we've known that patients must be kept off their back and positioned so that blood flow is restricted at their lower back, but it turns out that the positioning has different consequences in different areas of the body. Many people believe that an elevated back position actually improves circulation and encourages stronger bones, while others believe that an elevated back position actually worsens circulation. The bottom line is that we really don't know for sure why patients develop bedsores, but we've learned a little bit about some factors that may be involved. Poor
