It was about a group of people in England during the early twentieth century. They were all well off, and lived in two big houses called Downton Abbey and Highclere Castle. There were six married daughters, a son, and two unmarried sons. Their father-in-law (who lived in the town of Downton) was a Crawley, and he was the major (pardon the pun) character of the show. We first met him when the new head of the house, Matthew Crawley, was marrying Lady Mary Crawley, who was one of the daughters, and a distant cousin to her mother. He liked the idea of getting one of the Crawley families into his business, and tried to get the daughter who was married to the richest man in town. Unfortunately, he didn't know the rules that governed inheritances, and when he wanted to sell the business to Matthew, he ended up losing the house because it was bought by an American widow. Then, we met Lord Grantham, the husband of Cora, who was the wife of the previous owner. He was rich, but not rich enough to support a family of eight. Eventually, one of
